- From 3 to 15 November 1952, the Cambrai Kaserne on the east side of Highway No 96 in Wuenstorf-Zossen was still occupied by a total of 1,800 men belonging to a motor transport unit and an AAA unit. Most of the soldiers were red-bordered black epaulets with artillery insignia and about 30 percent black-bordered black epaulets. [] the motor transport unit furnished vehicles for the units in Wuenstorf and that the unit proper was quartered in the eastern section of the billeting area. In the western section of the billeting area, which housed the AA unit, [] an emplacement with heavy AA guns of about 85-mm caliber or more, with barrels of about 5 meters, with perforated cylindrical muzzle brakes, and 3 x 37-mm AA guns northwest of building No 170 and another emplacement with 7 x 37-mm AA guns northeast of house No 168. The individual guns were surrounded by earth mounds. Two or three earth bunkers housing the gun crews were observed in each emplacement. No ballistic directors were noticed. Seventeen heavy AA guns were lined up in two rows north of building No 170 east of the first emplacement. These guns were of the same type as those observed in the first emplacement. On 11 November, alert practices were held by the crew of the second emplacement. The crew rushed from the earth bunkers at the sound of a bell, removed the tarpaulins from the guns and started aiming at small wooden aircraft models. On the mornings of 11, 12, and 13 November, 30 to 45 officers with ranks of lieutenant and senior lieutenant and wearing signal insignia engaged in physical exercises which included the climbing of walls and running across horizontal bars with rifles and bayonets fixed. They also engaged in close combat practice with dummies. Trucks [] stopped at the main entrance. One or two large camouflage nets which [] covered other AAA emplacements, were seen about 900 meters northeast of the Cambrai Kaserne, in an open field. 1
